What is a cookie?

A cookie is a very small text file that is placed on your hard disk by a web server. It is actually a kind of identification that helps to distinguish one from the other user. A cookie is unique and can only be read by the server that you provided the cookie. Other techniques that the websites use, such as JavaScripts and web beacons, are standard internet techniques that allow data to be stored in the cookies, to send data and to keep track of how often a page is viewed.

What are cookies used for?

Cookies have different functions, which can be divided into three categories: functional cookies, analytical cookies and tracking cookies. Functional cookies are cookies that are required for the websites to function. This includes cookies that remember which language setting you have chosen. Analytical cookies are used, among other things, to measure the quality and effectiveness of the websites, for example by registering visitor statistics. Usually Google Analytics is used for this. Tracking cookies are cookies that register your surfing behavior on the websites, so that your profile can be compiled on the basis of which information relevant to you – such as advertisements – can be shown.
